DESIGNED FOR WELLNESS

On the Madison Avenue side, the building's mass is staggered, projecting further out from floor to floor. The sculpture garden, below street level between the pavement and the building, is traversed by a bridge protected by a concrete canopy. It can be accessed through a wall of glass that divides the sculpture garden into an outer and an inner area. The remainder of the cube is faced with grey granite and has only seven windows. One window (like the eye of Cyclops) is on the upper exhibition area. The remaining six appear to be arbitrarily scattered on the outside world. One window faces Madison Avenue, the remaining six appear to be arbitrarily scattered on the side that faces East 75th Street. The windows are set in frames that look almost as if they were placed off at an angle. On Madison Avenue the museum is set off from the street by a gap being filled by a recessed stairway; firewalls made of exposed brick emphasize the museum's solitary character. According to Breuer: "This all transforms the building into a sculpture itself."

In 2015 the Whitney Museum moved into a new building designed by Renzo Piano in the Meatpacking District. The Breuer building was taken over by the Metropolitan Museum of Art and renamed in 2016 as The Met Breuer.

The sculpture garden
Outdoor and indoor spaces interlock with the many different levels to create an exciting panoramic view.

Opposite page:
Staggering the façade created space for the sculpture garden a level below.

Anticipation builds for the shower that is the epitome of precision wellness, designed with uncompromising attention to the fine details that enhance life and please the senses.

THE RIVA COLLECTION

This sleek new shower system was inspired by the finely tooled dashboards of European luxury cars and yachts. The RIVA shower system evokes the pleasures of driving a luxurious sports car or yachting along a magnificent Mediterranean coastline.

ELEGANCE IN THE DETAILS

Every element of the collection is distinguished by refined, elegant details, meticulously crafted to express a timeless aesthetic.

REFINED INTELLIGENCE

Cutting-edge technology enhances everyday comfort and wellbeing, seamlessly integrated into a refined and sophisticated design.
